Simply put, a thesaurus is a collection of words grouped according to idea. Appearing in the A to Z listings of Roget’s 21st Century Thesaurus, Second Edition are about 20,000 words and 500,000 synonyms to choose from. This selection alone would seem generous enough to satisfy the lexicographer’s expectation of what a thesaurus should contain. But a wealth of new alternatives is created when we begin to think about the higher connections that can be made between words and ideas in the language. This is the purpose of Roget’s 21st Century’s Concept Index.

The Concept Index not only helps writers and thinkers to organize their ideas but leads them from those very ideas to the words that can best express them. It is a semantic hierarchy of the most common concepts we use in American English as it is spoken and written today.

There are 837 concepts classified according to their subject and usage, and grouped under ten general categories of interest: Actions, Fields of Human Activity, Objects, Qualities, States, and Weights and Measures.

All of Roget’s 21st Century Thesaurus’s 20,000 main entries are cross-referenced to related concepts. For example, when you look up the entry for “knowledgeable” in the A to Z listing, it is referenced to concept #402. Turning in the index to concept #402, “attribute of intelligence,” you will see over 50 other main entries that are also related to this concept:

Many main entries are referenced to as many as three or four different concepts.

Simple to use, the Concept Index becomes invaluable in the effort to turn an idea into a specific word. By linking together the main entries that share similar concepts, the index makes possible creative semantic connections between words in our language, stimulating thought and broadening vocabulary.
